THEY DWELL IN A CAVE

Officers Pursue Poor Men Like Flies in the Mountains.

The three stowaways who were brought ashore from the S. S. Miowera have not been caught as yet, although a reward of $10 for each man has been offered by the Marshal. Yesterday twelve residents of Puna valley reported that three white men were hiding in the valley, and that they looked like wild men. Two had no shoes to their feet and one had no hat. They were thinly clad, one with a threadbare patch to the seat of his pants. None had a coat. Lieutenant Holi and a posse of police took horses last night and rode up the valley. It was pretty hard traveling, but, it being clear moonlight, the officers did not mind that. The men traveled away into the heart of the mountains and in a hollow near the head of the valley they discovered a cave. It was under an overhanging rock of monstrous dimensions, and was something more than six feet deep. The entrance was covered with a tangle of guava bushes. Inside the cave banana peelings and green fruit were strewn about in confusion. In one corner was a bunch of rich ripe bananas. In another place was half a kerosene tin, fashioned into an apology for a stove, and alongside it was a pile of chips freshly cut. There was also a knife and a blanket. There were evidences that the cave had been only recently occupied, as the peelings of the bananas were still fresh. Lieutenant Holi says that the cave was quite a little cozy place, the guava trees in front keeping out the wind and rain. There was an abundance of fruit also in the neighborhood. The men they were looking for, however, were not there. Several residents were met with and interrogated, and among these were an elderly couple, who had lived in the mountains higher up than where the stowaways were located. About a week ago they say three white men suddenly appeared at their home and made a demand for something to eat and to wear. The couple were so frightened that they left their home and came down to the valley. The blanket, knife and cooking utensils found in the cave were taken from this house. The men were seen by another native at 3 o'clock yesterday afternoon. They were coming into town. It is the custom with the men to go out of nights and to return early in the morning and stay in their cave until late in the afternoon, when they sail forth for their nocturnal rambles.

The stowaways met the keeper of the reservoir near the Electric Station a few days ago, and told him that they weren't going to give themselves up. The Miowera had gone and this Government had no right to insist on their arrest. Each one exhibited a loaded pistol and threatened that if anyone made any attempt at arrest they would resist. The pistols were stolen from the Honolulu Dairy. After making a detour of the valley the officers, with the exception of one man, returned to town. The valley residents stated that if they knew rewards had been offered for their apprehension they would have arrested them, notwithstanding that they were armed.

ME: A WATERY GRAVE

Sad Ending of a Former Prosperous Merchant.

An accident occurred on the sloop Waianae some time last night, while the little vessel was between here and Waianae, which resulted in the drowning of Manuel Silva, the owner of the sloop. The Waianae, which has been plying between this port and the district the sloop is named after, left for that place at 5 o'clock yesterday afternoon, with quite a cargo of general merchandise. Silva was sitting on the rail of the little vessel and she was bowling along merrily. There was quite a breeze blowing at the time. Off Barber's Point a tack was suddenly made by the native skipper. Silva got in the way of the jibbing boom, which struck him and knocked him overboard. The sloop was hoisted to and arrived about the place for some time, but the man was never seen again.

Manuel Silva was well known in Honolulu. He formerly owned a large store and was considered to be comfortably situated financially. He leaves a wife with a large family.
